

ABSTRACT

El Ummah, Ivada. 2013. Perception of achievement on Street Children in Malang City. Thesis. Faculty of Psychology, State Islamic University of Maulana Malik Ibrahim Malang.

Supervisor : Fathul Lubabin Nuqul, M. Si.

Keywords: Performance, Street Children.

Street children often live and thrive under a stigma or stamp as a disturber of order whose have many motivations that drive them to survive and enjoy life with all its shortcomings. Many of those who have had enough of what they get now, but also not a few of those who want a big change and meaning in his life.

Along the journey of human life certainly has the desire to achieve a success or achievement. The conclusion of some achievement definitions are proposed by the experts that the achievement is a result that has been achieved from a business that has been done and created either individually or in groups in the form of knowledge and skills. Some of the factors that affect performance such as intelligence, motivation, personality, and environments are both the family and school.

In this research, the method which is used is the method mix (Mixed Methods Research) with data collection in the form of an open questionnaire. The subjects in this study are 30 street children, in this case to determine the subjects using purposive sampling technique with the provisions of the subjects are children aged between 6-18 years, including in the category of children on the street who spent more than 4 hours on the road and not include children who live in certain houses.

The results showed that the perception of street children against the proud achievement was closely related to economic problems. In addition to getting as much money from his work to his parents happy, street children are also proud of his accomplishments because they feel able to live independently without frustrating for parents. Factors which affect street children in the achievement of the performance are hard work, in which case they are supported by their parents to always be motivated to work harder. Several other street children pleaded to not get support from anyone in any form, but with hard work they can still achieve success.