Social justice also has the objective and subjective dimensions (Faturochman, 2002; 21). The results Faturochman (2001; 84) shows that the assessment process of justice can be assessed based on the principles of cognitive psychology. Faturochman and Djamaludin Ancok (2001; 41-60) suggests that a proper procedure will affect a person's judgment about procedural fairness. Psychology focuses on the realm of how people describe a sense of justice, how one argues with through his mind about the fairness (Skitka & Crosby, 2003). So that "what is said just" is derived from the relationship between the objective with the subjective perception of fairness. In other words, an individual judge's decision was fair or unfair, is a process of individual psychological level (Nuqul, 2008; 44). So the formulation of questions and research objectives focus on the meaning and form of criminal justice includes procedural justice, retributive and restorative starting from the arrest to the police, the courts until the lives of inmates in the Correctional Institute for Women Class IIA Malang. Given that the assessment will affect the assessment of procedural justice retributive and restorative justice.

The approach in this research is a qualitative method of phenomenology, the study subjects by 4 female prisoners with purposive criteria Marshall B. Clinard and Richard Quinney (in Hussein, 2003 ; 4). Techniques of data collection using interviews, observations, document form BAP (investigation report). Checking the validity of data using triangulation and membercheck.

Results showed generally interpret the research subject of justice is the principle of equality (equality) between the distribution of rights and duties and equal treatment (procedural), but there are subjects who interpret justice based on what has been obtained or derived benefits (restorative) on penalties (retributive) has indicted the judges. While the results of research on the meaning of procedural justice, the general subject of the study was procedurally unfair. In general, about the meaning of retributive justice, the subject of the study was not fair on the sentence he had received. Although it is not fair but the overall feel of research subjects to get much change out of his life in institutions has begun.
